YOUR PROBLEMS

by Ann Landers

"They Had Chosen To Play Ostrich . . ."

Dear Ann: Your letter from Star Gazer probably scored a direct hit on at least one million American homes. Mine was one of them.

I, like Jim's wife, am not supposed to "know what's going on." But I DO know, and what's more I have known for three years. Often in your column, Ann, someone asks if she should tell a friend, "as an act of kindness," that her husband is running around. You always say "NO. Carrying such information is not an act of kindness. Mind your own business." I bless you for this advice, Ann. Almost every wife knows—unless she is an imbecile.

At first when I saw them together holding hands, I was numb from the shock. Then the hurt and humiliation set in. After crying my heart out for weeks I decided, for the sake of my sanity, I had to make a tremendous decision. I could confront my husband with the choice (and risk breaking up our home and depriving three lovely children of their father) or I could swallow my pride, play deaf, dumb and blind, and hope the affair would wear itself out.

I know in my heart that I made the right decision. I am living up to my responsibilities even if my husband is not. The point of this letter is to let you know that just because a wife doesn't wear her heartache on her sleeve, and go around town with swollen eyes, doesn't mean she is being fooled. It often means that she has great courage and that she has decided to put first things first. — AWARE.

Dear Aware: I received dozens of letters from readers who have said essentially the same thing, and I have great admiration for all of you.

The letters, strangely enough, were not all from women. Some husbands wrote to say that they had chosen to play the ostrich. A high school teacher from Memphis said "How does a father tell his children that their mother is stepping around with a family friend? Now I know the true meaning of the phrase 'discretion is the greater part of valor.'"

Dear Ann: My brother's widow moved back to this city and has taken a house (Continued on Page 12)
